Guillot, a young farmer, has recently become guardian to his wealthy godfather’s young niece, Denise. Guillot is severe with her – barking orders and scolding her for unfinished chores. His severity makes the lonely Denise even more unhappy with her new circumstances.

Guillot rationalizes his severe behavior toward Denise. He fears that unless he keeps her busy, she will fall prey to the village “playboy,” Grevin. Guillot has promised his godfather to protect the young woman, and he fears something happening to her on his watch. His tone, however, suggests there’s more to his concern.

Two village widows, Fanchette and Catherine, appear before Guillot’s farmhouse. They’re discussing their previous disastrous marriages and their shared desire to find a rich husband. When Guillot appears, they mock and torment him. He’s everything they don’t want in their next husband – he’s poor. Coming from the post office, Denise brings a letter to Guillot. It’s from his wealthy godfather. Guillot reads it aloud in front of the two widows. In response to a request for money, his godfather has decided to give him “a treasure!” He can find it, the letter states, under the large tree that night when the evening bell rings. The two widows now deeply desire Guillot. They compete for his affection and threaten each other in rivalry for him.

That night, Denise appears alone. Her uncle has sent her a letter too – a response to a note she wrote to him describing her unhappiness. He instructs her to sit beneath the large tree that night. When the evening bell sounds, he tells her, her heart will be cheered. She follows his instructions and unintentionally falls asleep under the tree. Guillot appears, shovel in hand, prepared to unearth his treasure. He’s not alone, however; Fanchette and Catherine have covertly arrived to descend upon Guillot and his treasure. Where the “treasure” should be, Guillot spots the sleeping Denise. It’s not long before he realizes what his godfather has cleverly orchestrated for him and the young woman. Much to the consternation of the widows, Guillot asks for Denise’s hand in marriage.

BASTIANELLO

A young man, home from college, is found relaxing in a tree. He acknowledges the audience, and tells them that he will narrate a favorite family story. Figures from the past appear, and the young man’s story commences – a story which begins twenty years in the past.

A young bride and groom, Amadora and Luciano, have just “tied the knot.” All that remain of the wedding party is the young couple and the parents. After many toasts, Amadora goes to the cellar to retrieve more wine. While there, she begins to think and becomes depressed. One by one, the family members come to the cellar to check on each other. The last to appear in the cellar is the impetuous groom. He notices that his new bride has spilled wine on the floor – an unpardonable offence! He vows to leave her and to not return until he’s found six people more foolish than his new bride and the parents.
He begins his journey through the countryside the next day. He comes upon an arguing couple. The man, it appears, cannot figure how to put on his pants – a daily, lifelong torment. Without pants, the man cannot begin his day’s chores. Luciano solves the couple’s marital strife by showing the man how to properly put on his pants. The now ecstatic couple thanks him, and Luciano moves on in search of four more fools.

The next day he discovers a disturbance in a wedding procession at the gates of a “one horse town.” Luciano asks the horse (atop which is the bride) what’s going on. The horse explains that the bride upon his back is going to meet her groom, but there is a hitch in the plan: an archway on the outskirts of town is too low to let the bride pass underneath. Each time she attempts to clear the arch, she bumps her head on it. Therefore, to clear the arch, only two (equally unpleasant) options present themselves: either cut off the bride’s head, or cut off the horse’s legs. Luciano explains to the group that all the bride has to do to clear the arch is lower her head. The bride tries it. It works! Luciano set-out to find the final fool – fool number six.

On the third day, Luciano comes upon a man casting a net into a lake at night. He asks the man what he’s doing. The man explains that once a month he sees deceased wife’s face shining on the lake, and he attempts to catch it. Her image, however, shatters it into a million pieces with each attempt. The man relates the story of his own “stupidity” that led to his wife’s drowning. Luciano realizes the stupidity in the man’s story as similar to the stupidity he displayed with his new bride only days before. Luciano has found the sixth fool: himself.

Luciano returns home to his bride and she forgives him. Returning his story to the present, the narrator and his father and mother (Luciano and Amadora) sing a toast to love.
Le mariage aux lanternes (1857)

The legacy of Jacques Offenbach (1819-1880) resides in his nearly 100 comedic operettas produced across three decades, 1850s-1870s. Modern audiences are likely to know Offenbach principally as the composer of the beloved opera, The Tales of Hoffmann. This work is a bit of a one-off in the composer’s output, however – a late-in life-attempt to compose a serious opera. Unfortunately, Offenbach died prior to completing Hoffmann, and consequently, it exists in several performance versions. Very fortunately, however, he left behind an impressive body of comedic works that inspired such musical-theater luminaries as W.S. Gilbert and Arthur Sullivan, and Johann Strauss, Jr.

In his own lifetime, Offenbach’s reputation was that of a virtuosic cellist and composer of comedic and highly satirical musical-theater works, which Offenbach himself termed operetta (among other unique descriptions). A direct forerunner to American musical theater, operetta is characterized by light subject-matters and musical numbers separated by spoken dialogue. The vast majority of Offenbach’s operettas are (like Le mariage aux lanternes) short operas – comedies in only one act. Offenbach also wrote several full-length operettas, including the still frequently performed satires La belle Hélène (The Beautiful Helen [of Troy]), 1864, and Orphée aux enfers (Orpheus in the Underworld), 1858. In these two works, and others, Offenbach and his librettists humorously adapted well-known Ancient Greek myths to critique the Second French Empire regime of Napoleon III.

Despite playing in the orchestra of Paris’s famed Opera-Comique, and occasionally conducting performances of other composer’s work, Offenbach was unable to convince the company’s management to commission a work from himself. So, in 1855, Offenbach opened a small theater in the Champs-Élysées where he could produce his own works and the works of other young composers. Strict licensing regulations limited Offenbach to producing works in only one-act, and with fewer than five singing characters. It was in Offenbach’s theater, the Salle Choiseul (or the Théâtre des Bouffes-Parisiens), and under these licensing restrictions, that the one-act operetta Le mariage aux lanternes premiered in October, 1857.

For our production at Georgia State University, we have chosen to sing the musical numbers in the original French, but to present the dialogue in English – a common performance-tradition for operetta in the United States. We are fortunate to have been allowed to use the excellent dialogue adaptation/translation of Dr. Jen Stephenson (Baylor University) for our production.

Bastianello (2008)

Composer and pianist John Musto (b.1954) is one of America’s foremost composers of opera, vocal music, and chamber works. A recipient of numerous awards, Musto was a Pulitzer Prize finalist for his 1996 orchestral song-cycle, Dove Sta Amore. Musto’s operas have been produced regularly at companies, festivals, and in university programs. Musto’s recent operas include Volpone (based on the Ben Johnson comedy), Later That Same Evening (inspired by a series of Edward Hopper paintings), and the satirical one-act Bastianello (based on an Italian folktale).

For all three of the above operas, and others, Musto collaborated with the equally celebrated American librettist, Mark Campbell, who in 2012 won the Pulitzer-Prize for Music with composer Kevin Puts for their World War 1-era opera, Silent Night. Campbell has written the libretto for many of the most important opera premieres in the past ten years, including: As One (Laura Kaminsky), The (R)evolution of Steve Jobs (Mason Bates), Stonewall (Iain Bell), and The Shining (Paul Moravec).

Musto and Campbell’s one-act Bastianello premiered in 2008 alongside William Bolcom’s one-act Lucrezia (also with a libretto by Mark Campbell) as a twentieth-anniversary project for the New York Festival of Song. The two one-acts, both comedies, were originally scored for only two pianos and a cast of only five performers each. In 2016, GSU Director of Opera, JJ Hudson, had the pleasure of directing the orchestral premier of Bastianello at Rochester Lyric Opera with the composer in residence.

The performance indications of Bastianello allow for as few as five performers playing multiple characters (as originally conceived), or as many as twelve performers if each of the many characters is played by different actors. For our production at Georgia State University, we are pleased to present the original two-piano version of Bastianello using only five singing-actors.
What a thrill and honor it is to assume leadership of GSU Opera Theater! I join the GSU faculty after more than a decade of freelance opera directing in the professional arena. It’s such a joy now to work with talented and enthusiastic students in their first opera roles. I feel a great responsibility to help prepare them – the next generation of opera performers! – for the professional world that awaits them.

Young-artists, such as those talented and dedicated artists in the GSU Opera Program, will be entering an opera industry quite different from that of past generations. The opera industry is experiencing many new levels of growth and awareness – an evolution to leading to many positive and exciting changes. Beloved operatic “classics” – the staples of most opera companies – are being reexamined and produced in ever more thoughtful and technically innovative ways. In addition, opera companies are beginning to regularly program and commission new operas (potentially new “classics!”) by contemporary artists – including operas by traditionally underrepresented artists/creators of opera. The industry is even expanding the lines of genre itself to include a wider variety of “lyric theater” works; a brief survey of opera companies’ seasons will see show inclusion of “cross-over” works – in particular, works from musical theater.

To prepare the next generation of opera performers for the evolving and expanding professional world of opera, a university opera program must evolve and expand as well. It must provide students with experiences that simulate not only the industry’s expanding repertoire, but also its new technological approaches to production. Not surprisingly, significant resources are required to provide students with these very experiences.

To help prepare our talented GSU students we need your support. We are grateful to receive funding from the GSU Student Activities Council. But to offset production costs and to produce the variety of opera that our students need – and with production values that they and YOU can take great pride in – we rely on outside funding by generous supporters like you.
